She wanted to know how we could put the overheads on our beer fridges, as she had seen some that had old style cap guns to keep beer clean. One of our supply chain colleagues suggested that they were very simple indeed, and fitted with a standard pre-war pint glass, and that was it! We then suggested that if they gave us a photo they would be pretty quick to hook you up, and our customer seemed happy with the "no fuss" approach we suggested. Just before Christmas, we had a lovely little call from her asking us to put a couple of fizzers in. She said she was using a beer fridge and just wanted some pointers for a better look. As she had asked for help with a fizzy pint, we suggested that she might like to get her head straight on what was actually needed, and asked her to write down her thoughts on what she wanted to do, and we would then fill her in on the "for real" parts. After quite a detailed description and a bit of back and forth, we got our customer to agree that what she wanted would be around £300 and for us to build her a beer fridge with the following specification: Freezer: 3400, freezer capacity is likely to be around 120LB. Cage: A standard American beer fridges cage. This would involve three U shape sections with clear

Quantification of enzymatic active probes in natural samples with spatially modulated excitation spectra and stimulated emission depletion (STED). The level of non-negligible impurities in pharmaceutical preparations remains the most challenging issue in the quality assessment process. Accurate quantification of active components is of significant importance in monitoring the batch-to-batch quality control (QC) and thus preventing potential side effects caused by the presence of toxic compounds. Herein, an all-in-one active-targeting methodology is reported for the STED-based fluorescence imaging. Based on the variant of the 3D STORM (STORM and Related Single Molecule Localization Techniques) method, this technique takes a deterministic three-dimensional (3D) image acquisition approach for actively targeting enzymatic active probes with stochastic excitation of individual dye molecules. The developed methodology is validated by simultaneously quantifying the level of probes in various natural samples and drug preparations. Mr Brown has asked ministers to investigate whether it is necessary to bring in another round of charges against Abu Hamza, as the UK remains under pressure to extradite to the US all individuals alleged to have committed crimes there. Sir John Stanley, the lord chief justice, has suggested that the case should be considered as a "public order matter", rather than one under the criminal law. A wide variety of medical diagnostic and therapeutic procedures involve the introduction of a device into the vasculature of a patient. One example is transcatheter therapy, in which medical devices are introduced into the vasculature of a patient by a catheter through either a percutaneous procedure, a transvascular procedure, or the like. One type of therapeutic procedure which has become more common is transcatheter delivery of embolic material to vascular occlusions in order to preserve vascular patency. Such procedures are typically performed in the following way: A guidewire is first introduced into the vasculature of the patient and delivered to the occlusion site, where it is subsequently advanced into the occluded vessel. An interventional catheter is then advanced over the guidewire to the occluded vessel and an embolic material is delivered through the lumen of the catheter and into the vessel. Transluminal devices are medical devices which are used to provide support for the treatment of vascular occlusions or other intravascular abnormalities, such as aneurysms. Traditionally, medical practitioners place such devices, which include both metallic and non-metallic stents, at the distal end of a catheter for delivery to a particular location within a patient's body. Delivery may be accomplished with the aid of a guidewire which is introduced through a patient's vasculature, either
