n1614-1-a0 Q: Will the compiler optimize away a map structure? Consider the following struct:

```
struct S { int val = 0; S() { std::map m; m[0] = 5; } S(int v) :
val(v) { } void set(const std::map
const { this->m[0] = 0; } };

When I set the map in the constructor, should I be worried about the map getting destroyed on each access to the object? This code compiled fine with Clang 3.5, and ICC 12.1, but, is it ill-advised, at best, to do this? A: If you can absolutely be sure the map won't be modified after construction, and you'll store it only in a const object, then you can safely do this. Otherwise you should probably avoid this - even though it's officially portable, it may not be to every compiler, and it may be bad style. It looks like a bad style to me, if you're not 100% sure that it's safe. The lack of constexpr in C++11 makes it a bit more difficult, but if you define it as inline, it can still be a little
