I'm experimenting with custom milling of the outer part of the puzzle. I already have the base of the puzzle (the hole is drilled already, I just had to do some hackaw work to remove the sides) and the interior of the upper part of the puzzle (I just need the bushings, but that has to be done through the outer sleeve to keep the bearings clean). Now I'm going to do some test parts and try the outer bushings! Saturday, December 11, 2010 I ordered a 20" Microtech milling machine, and it has arrived. This is one of the best mills I've seen, both in quality and ease of use. At around $1200 it should last for a long time, and run on easy home shop power. The table and base are all welded, and this is the only spot weld I've ever done. The router bit is built in, and they also have a decent drill press and a table saw, all of which are attached to a rigid steel base. The base supports are 500w or more, so they can really run strong. I ordered the mill on Monday, and I arrived Wednesday. I spent the next few days just getting it set up. I had to get the plumbed electrical started up, and I wired it for 24-30VDC power, just in case. This was very easy, as it just plugs into a regular 120VAC outlet, and you can use either a 30 or 120VAC/24VAC switch. I had to get an electrician out to put a conduit for the power. I was also going to buy some standard double pole circuit breakers, but these switches with two hot wires are much better than those, and only cost a bit more. I would like to get the router bit built in the exterior diameter of the router bit needs to have 2h open to allow the drill press to work, and keep things tight enough for the bit to
