The receiver then decodes the modulated signal to extract the desired signals. For example, a desired signal may be modulated onto a carrier signal, thus forming a modulation symbol. The modulation symbol is then encoded into a signal having a desired format such as amplitude modulation (AM), frequency modulation (FM), phase shift keying (PSK), quadrature amplitude modulation (QAM), or a combination of these formats. The encoded signal is transmitted over the communications channel. The encoded signal may then be received at the receiver. A receiving device at the receiver may receive the encoded signal, and attempt to detect information encoded into the signal. For example, the information may be represented by data bits in the encoded signal. Detecting the information in the encoded signal may be challenging due to the presence of noise and interference in the encoded signal. The noise and interference may have a relatively high power and may be identical to one or more components of the encoded signal.
